Strangerland

Kim Farrant's striking feature debut marks Nicole Kidman's welcome return to Australian independent cinema with a fearless performance of deep vulnerability and emotion. Soon after the Parkers move to the remote desert town of Nathgari, the teenage children of Catherine (Kidman) and Matthew (Joseph Fiennes) mysteriously disappear. With Nathgari eerily smothered in red dust and darkness, the townsfolk join the search led by a local cop, David Rae (Hugo Weaving). As temperatures rise and the chances of survival plummet with each passing day, Catherine and Matthew find themselves pushed to the brink. Farrant brilliantly ratchets up the tension, and gradually dark secrets are revealed. The outback here functions as a beautiful but dangerous force, as important as the characters. A fresh addition to a long tradition of films set in remote Australia, Strangerland is distinct in its compelling depiction of female sexuality. Says Farrant: "Strangerland examines how people react in times of crisis and how our deep fear of the unknown and our abhorrence of feeling pain can push us over the edge emotionally, psychologically and physically ... especially sexually."
